There is some prejudice against the use of untinned copper preserving pans, but, properly used, there is no danger in them. No preserve of red fruit can be made with its proper color in a pan lined with tin, as the action of acid on this metal is to produce a violet or purple tinge. If copper preserving pans are kept scrupulously clean and the fruit is not allowed to cool in them, there can be no valid reason against their use.

Oil in the spring to prevent it of his fellow-countrymen and the foreign Consuls the Khedive abdicated, he took his harem and such valuables as he eould lay his hands on and went to Naples, intending to live a quiet life of study and meditation, surrounded by his harem and his portable property.

At Naples his troubles began. The Government rented him a fine palace —popularly known as the Favorita—on the shore of the bay and at the foot of Vesuvius, where he took up his residence and arranged his collection of wives in a series of pleasant rooms. proud of it. Before very long, however, he found that a harem cannot be kept together so easily in Naples as in Cairo. The windows of the palace were not latticed, and the ladies of the harem could not be prevented from looking out at the people in the street. Neither was it practicable to prevent stray Italians from seeing an occasional wife at a window. The eunuchs did their best to keep the harem in subjection, but their efforts were unavailing, and before the ex-Khedive had occupied his palace many weeks he was compelled to notice that his harem was gradually growing smaller.

He at once spoke about it to the chief eunuch, and demanded to know if several of his wives were not missing. The eunuch maintained that beyond the usual loss of wives by the wear and tear be thus deceived. He was confident that seven or eight of his best wives had vanished, and although, owing to the want of a trustworthy catalogue, he could not prove that he was right. he resolved that no more losses should occur without his knowlege.

A careful watch soon showed the leak in the harem. Every night a throng of fuls sugar, two teaspoonfuls baking handsome young Italians would appear powder, two tablespoonfuls lard, three under the windows of the palace, and a under the windows of the palace, and a few wives would jump into their arms.
